The symbolism of modern insanity

The other night a group of people thought that the best thing they could do with shout their endorsement of the "Black Lives Matter" organization [1]. They thought they were safe in doing something so clearly dangerous because they had a few cars blocking the highway.

Suddenly, their smugness evaporated and was replaced by terror as a car came barreling towards them. The car, driven by a black man, had entered the highway by going the wrong direction on an onramp.

Two people who seem like they could be female were struck by the car. One died, the other is in critical condition. From the looks of them (1 2) this wasn't the first time they had made a very poor choice in life. For one of them, it is the last

I'm not sure a writer of any degree of brilliance could have come up with a better analogy for our present society and the correction that is upon us.

[1] - I said endorsement of that organization, because if the lives of black people really mattered to them, they would probably be doing something that made a more meaningful impact on the leading cause of death of black people--other black people--instead of endorsing a patently Marxist organization whose platform, if achieved, will do far more harm to all blacks in America (and countless people of other races) than cops have.
