Galveston County fraud calls

Texas City police said at least six people have reported some form of phone-call scams in which money was sent out of state or out of the country. All of the targets were older people who thought they were buying tickets to the Olympics. The caller directed the victim to send the money to a subsidiary of their employer.

Four calls were made to addresses in New York City. However, a Houston police spokesman said it was a family matter.

GALVESTON COUNTY, TEXAS

The caller posing as her grandson claimed she had been in an accident and needed cash.

July 26

A 64-year-old woman said a caller claiming to be from the Federal Reserve Bank had a grant available. The victim sent two Western Union transfers totaling $2,523 before realizing she was being scammed.

Aug. 14

A 64-year-old woman said a man claiming to be from Microsoft tech support called to provide repair work on her computer. The woman told police that the two previously called Microsoft did not do work on her computer. She paid the woman for her computer. The next day she found out she had been scammed.

A 72-year-old man reported that a woman claiming to be his "favorite granddaughter" claimed she had been upset and embarrassed. The next day she found out she had been scammed.

A 72-year-old man reported that a woman he met several years ago claimed she had been arrested for wire fraud in an accident in Mexico and was at the U.S. embassy. The man directed her to send $2,520 for bond money. The woman thought the call was a scam. She called her grandson only to find out he was in an accident and needed cash.

Oct. 1

An 84-year-old woman was called claiming to resented six people who have reported some form of phone-call scams in which money was sent out of state or out of the country. All of the targets were older people who thought they were buying tickets to the Olympics. The caller directed the victim to send the money to a subsidiary of their employer.

Four calls were made to addresses in New York City. However, a Houston police spokesman said it was a family matter.

GALVESTON COUNTY, TEXAS

The caller posing as her grandson claimed she had been in an accident and needed cash.

July 26

A 64-year-old woman said a caller claiming to be from the Federal Reserve Bank had a grant available. The victim sent two Western Union transfers totaling $2,523 before realizing she was being scammed.

Aug. 14

A 64-year-old woman said a man claiming to be from Microsoft tech support called to provide repair work on her computer. The woman told police that the two previously called Microsoft did not do work on her computer. She paid the woman for her computer. The next day she found out she had been scammed.

A 72-year-old man reported that a woman claiming to be his "favorite granddaughter" claimed she had been upset and embarrassed. The next day she found out she had been scammed.

A 72-year-old man reported that a woman he met several years ago claimed she had been arrested for wire fraud in an accident in Mexico and was at the U.S. embassy. The man directed her to send $2,520 for bond money. The woman thought the call was a scam. She called her grandson only to find out he was in an accident and needed cash.

Oct. 1

An 84-year-old woman was called claiming to re-

Young, who admits that she thought he sounded a little old and that he was not a Microsoft employee.

Texas City police said at least six people have reported some form of phone-call scams in which money was sent out of state or out of the country. All of the targets were older people who thought they were buying tickets to the Olympics. The caller directed the victim to send the money to a subsidiary of their employer.

Four calls were made to addresses in New York City. However, a Houston police spokesman said it was a family matter.

GALVESTON COUNTY, TEXAS

The caller posing as her grandson claimed she had been in an accident and needed cash.

July 26

A 64-year-old woman said a caller claiming to be from the Federal Reserve Bank had a grant available. The victim sent two Western Union transfers totaling $2,523 before realizing she was being scammed.

Aug. 14

A 64-year-old woman said a man claiming to be from Microsoft tech support called to provide repair work on her computer. The woman told police that the two previously called Microsoft did not do work on her computer. She paid the woman for her computer. The next day she found out she had been scammed.

A 72-year-old man reported that a woman claiming to be his "favorite granddaughter" claimed she had been upset and embarrassed. The next day she found out she had been scammed.

A 72-year-old man reported that a woman he met several years ago claimed she had been arrested for wire fraud in an accident in Mexico and was at the U.S. embassy. The man directed her to send $2,520 for bond money. The woman thought the call was a scam. She called her grandson only to find out he was in an accident and needed cash.

Oct. 1

An 84-year-old woman was called claiming to re-

Young, who admits that she thought he sounded a little old and that he was not a Microsoft employee.

Texas City police said at least six people have reported some form of phone-call scams in which money was sent out of state or out of the country. All of the targets were older people who thought they were buying tickets to the Olympics. The caller directed the victim to send the money to a subsidiary of their employer.

Four calls were made to addresses in New York City. However, a Houston police spokesman said it was a family matter.

GALVESTON COUNTY, TEXAS

The caller posing as her grandson claimed she had been in an accident and needed cash.

July 26

A 64-year-old woman said a caller claiming to be from the Federal Reserve Bank had a grant available. The victim sent two Western Union transfers totaling $2,523 before realizing she was being scammed.

Aug. 14

A 64-year-old woman said a man claiming to be from Microsoft tech support called to provide repair work on her computer. The woman told police that the two previously called Microsoft did not do work on her computer. She paid the woman for her computer. The next day she found out she had been scammed.

A 72-year-old man reported that a woman claiming to be his "favorite granddaughter" claimed she had been upset and embarrassed. The next day she found out she had been scammed.

A 72-year-old man reported that a woman he met several years ago claimed she had been arrested for wire fraud in an accident in Mexico and was at the U.S. embassy. The man directed her to send $2,520 for bond money. The woman thought the call was a scam. She called her grandson only to find out he was in an accident and needed cash.

Oct. 1

An 84-year-old woman was called claiming to re-

Young, who admits that she thought he sounded a little old and that he was not a Microsoft employee.