Commission and said members were shocked to find that West and her staff work relentlessly to educate residents about the demand for marijuana. It’s a dynamic piece of our economic puzzle.

But reminded legislators that the state’s well-being should come first, even if it means being tough on drug dealers. "We do this because we’re West Virginians," Taylor said. "We have a responsibility to the people of this state to bring back jobs, lower taxes or whatever it may be that makes our lives better."
