

Electoral representation vs. state population

The Electoral College was set up to keep populous states from dominating presidential elections, which has created a disparity in representation advantaging thinly-populated states. In Wyoming, for example, one elector represents 195,000 residents, while an elector in Texas represents nearly 723,000 residents.

800 thousand residents per electoral vote

*Maine splits its electoral total between the statewide winner and the winner of each Congressional District. While Hillary Clinton won the state, Donald Trump won one electoral vote.
