Study finds ‘toxic’ climate
USC report issues 12 recommendations to fix SWC’s racial problems

‘We dropped the ball’
TAKING THE BLAME: Trustee Nina Morgan holds herself and the Governing Board accountable for not properly communicating efforts to eradicate race issues that have plagued the campus for decades.

Brittany Cruz/Editorial Staff

Southwestern College has “one of the two or three most toxic” racial climates of 50 colleges studied by USC’s Race and Equity Center, President Kenneth Morial reported to the community in July 2017.

Dr. Sham Hayer, founder and executive director of the USC Race and Equity Center, was taken aback by SWC’s anti-blackness problem.

“The stories we heard from classified employees at Southwestern were the worst of any place we have seen,” Harper wrote.

Researchers were told by multiple classified employees that Caucasian and Latinx employees have called them the “N-word.” Other complaints included physical attacks. A full-time faculty member, who is black, said they were mistreated for a transparent and heart by a campus police
