

Missouri uses native species on its reclaimed abandoned mine lands

The Missouri Department of Natural Resources is working to mend the scars that remain from years of unregulated coal, lead and zinc mining on thousands of acres in Missouri. Its strategies include earthwork and plantings to control soil erosion and restore habitat. Landowner preferences and potential land uses help the DNR determine exactly what to plant, but the department emphasizes the use of native species.

