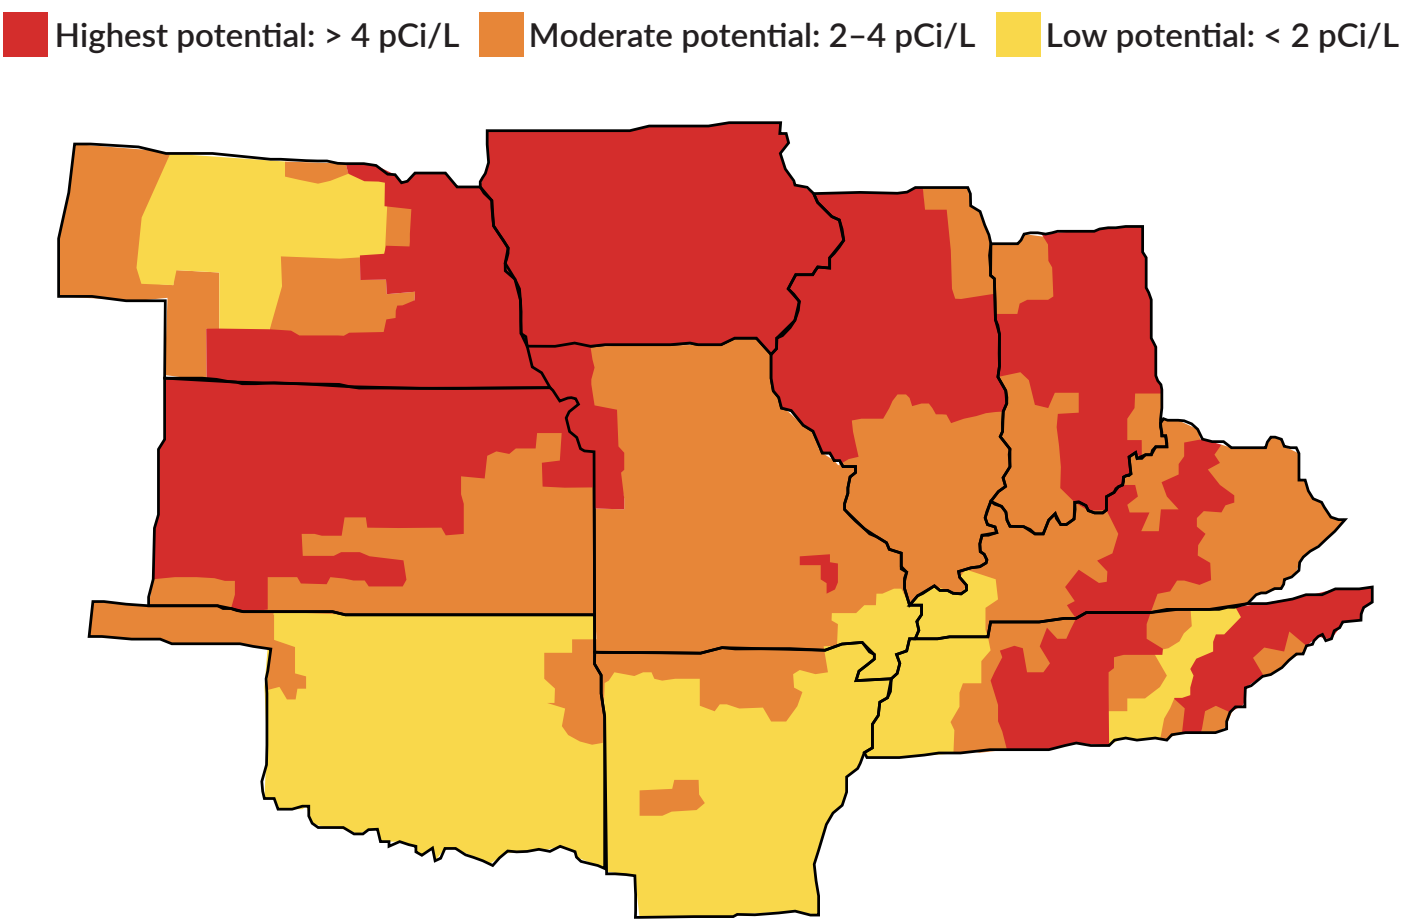
Varying testing requirements paint an incomplete picture

Experts say the federal "Map of Radon Zones" is flawed because it's based on testing data from individual states, and requirements vary widely.

The map makes it look like radon levels drop significantly at the Iowa-Missouri border and along the Missouri-Illinois border, but both of those states have much stronger testing requirements than Missouri.



Source: EPA

TEDDY MAIORCA/Missourian