

Groundwater testing at utility companies in Missouri shows signs of pollution

After the U.S. government established federal regulations on coal ash, utility companies were required to conduct groundwater testing around their properties — and post their results — by 2018. In Missouri, several utility companies found polluting chemicals, some much more than the recommended amount, in their water.

