Executive says he manipulated 'Rosie' circulation numbers

The Associated Press
NEW YORK — An executive from the former publisher of Rosie O'Donnell's magazine said he recommended manipulating circulation figures to hide losses so it could keep publishing.

"We did not want to shut down," Lawrence Diamond of Gruner + Jahr USA testified Monday in Manhattan's state Supreme Court. O'Donnell and G+J are suing each other for breach of contract.

Diamond said the decision to recommend tweaking circulation numbers came after an e-mail memo on April 26, 2002, from magazine executive Glenn Spotto. "Bad news coming on the newsstand, it appears that we are inching closer to that trigger point," Spotto wrote. O'Donnell quit the magazine in mid-September 2002, and it folded with the December 2002 issue.

The publishers sued her for $100 million, alleging breach of contract for walking out. O'Donnell countersued for $125 million, declaring that by cutting her out of key editorial decisions, G+J had violated its contract with her.

Her lawyers on Monday said G+J executives were falsifying circulation numbers during the height of the fight for magazine control.

But Diamond said G+J executives decided to "manage the financials" of the magazine, so they could keep publishing. If the magazine lost more than $4.2 million in a fiscal year, O'Donnell would have been permitted to end her arrangement with G+J.

"We thought it was in both parties' interests to continue publishing the magazine," Diamond said. "We thought it had great potential and great future value."

LOVE RIDE LEADER

CASTAIC, Calif. — Jay Leno led 20,000 bikers on the 20th annual Love Ride charity run from Glendale to Castaic Lake, where a barbecue and a ZZ Top concert awaited them.

"How many people here are on parole?" Leno, host of NBC's "Tonight" show, cracked Sunday, getting a roar of approval from the leather-clad crowd — among them Peter Fonda and Pat Boone — that helped raise an estimated $1 million for various charities.

There were odd moments, including Boone leading the crowd in a heavy-metal version of the national anthem.

Motorcyclists kicked off the 50-mile ride to the concert site by lining up for blocks around Harley-Davidson of Glendale. The procession stretched out for miles along Interstate 5.

BRONCHITIS

LONDON — Pop singer Christina Aguilera canceled the final two concerts of her British tour, saying she had acute bronchitis.

Aguilera

The 22-year-old pop singer apologized to fans who were expecting to see her perform at the Telecast Arena in Newcastle on Monday and at Manchester's MEN Arena on Tuesday. "I am terribly sorry for any inconvenience caused, but my doctor has ordered me to my bed and told me I cannot perform for at least 10 days," Aguilera said.
