hundred dollars. Without the assistance, millions of people might not be able to afford continued coverage, analysts say. The president, as well as his Republican colleagues in Congress, vowed to get rid of Obamacare and replace it with something better. Yet, all proposals they have put forth in Congress are projected to mean that at least more than 20 million people will lose coverage within the next decade. And the president hasn't put forth any detailed plan of his own - other than proposing to weaken the nation's current health care law and likely drive up many consumers' premiums. The president's duty is to execute the law of the land. Right now, the ACA continues to be the law of the land, and he should not unilaterally veer from that. In this case, many of his constituents are likely to suffer if he does.

admitted fewer refugees in the late 1970s and early 2000s, and the Statue of Liberty still stood. Three, although Acosta objected to giving a preference to English speakers, knowing English helps people make it in this country, and it's reasonable to want immigrants to speak the language. As Miller pointed out, this is already a requirement for naturalization. Fourth, despite the myth, immigration policy has been highly contested throughout American history, and levels have ebbed and flowed. Acosta seems to think that the status quo is the norm, when the past 40 years have represented a historic wave of immigration. Cotton-Perdue can't be considered ungenerous in light of how latitudinarian we have been for so long. As the Pew Research Center notes, we have the largest immigrant population in the world. The share of the U.S. population that is foreign-born will soon eclipse the record of 15 percent from around the turn of the 20th century. The Cotton-Perdue merit system for green cards is hardly nothingism. Given how the bill cribs from the system in Canada, it could be described with that cliched banal phrase: "a worthwhile Canadian initiative." And an emphasis on skills will take some of the pressure of immigration off the country's low-skilled workers. Employers may complain about losing access to immigrant labor, but it is simply not true that there are jobs that Americans won't do. Almost every occupational category in the country has a majority of native-born workers. If nothing else, Cotton-Perdue will force a debate in an area in which thoughtless sentimentality has long dominated -- and if the Miller-Acosta exchange is any indication, will be difficult to dislodge.

TAKING RESPONSIBILITY

The motivation to preplan a funeral often comes out of consideration and love for the immediate family members who will survive you. Funeral preplanning spares your survivors the stress of making difficult decisions under pressure while enabling you to choose the specific services you want. When preplanning, put your preferences in writing and give copies to family members and your attorney. Also be sure to keep a copy in a readily accessible place. Avoid putting the only copy of your preferences in a safety deposit box, which precludes making arrangements on a weekend or holiday. Do not designate your preferences in your will, which is often not found or read until after the funeral.

We plan ahead for the important events of our lives. Why not do so for the commemoration of our passing? Doing so alleviates those left behind from having to make those difficult decisions while grieving.
