CONTRIBUTED PHOTOS

Cindy Meyer shared these photos she took in Littlefork of an American robin and its two young. Resource agencies encourage to look, but don't touch birds that appear to have fallen from their nests. Young robins often fly out of the nest before they are able to fly back; their parents will continue to feed them and they will get the strength they need to fly back within a day or two. Should you find a young bird in your yard that appears abandoned, think twice before "rescuing" it. If you can find and reach the nest, then it's OK to put the bird back. Its parents will not abandon it. It is myth that birds will abandon their young because of human smell. Robins and most other birds have a very poor sense of smell. If you can't find or reach the nest, then check the health of the bird. A baby bird completely covered with feathers and can hop away from you does not need your help.
