Books that make you want to get outside

Hopefully March's arrival will bring warmer weather even as daylight increases. I know the longer days are making me want to get out and enjoy the sunshine. I dream of baseball, gardening, long walks by the lake and all those other summer activities that just don't work as well in winter.

Here are some new books that made me want to get outside but also made me feel as if I could wait until the weather cooperated. "Homegrown Berries" published by Timber Press. This book says you can successfully grow your own strawberries, raspberries, blueberries, blackberries and more. I love berries and nothing beats fresh berries sun warmed and eaten right off the bush. I hope to be growing more berries this year.

Those of us living in town generally have limited space for vegetable gardens and if you make use of the community garden beds you have limited space to grow as well. "Small-space Vegetable Gardens" by Andrea Bellamy is a great resource for 'growing great edibles in containers, raised beds and small plots.' She provides lots of ideas, details and information to allow successful gardening in small spaces. "The Glory of the Tree" by Noel Kingsbury is a coffee table-sized book with glorious pictures and incredible details about growth, life and ninety species of trees from around the world. While not particularly 'summer' related, "The Horse Lover" by H. Alan Day details one cowboy's quest to save the wild mustang. The tale make me think of wide open prairies, hot summer days and running free. "A Story Written in the Rocks" by Chris B. Hemstad tells the geology of Voyageurs National Park and this book made me want to get out in the park exploring the features talked about and finding some of these rocks. Jeff High has written a tale set as the seasons change from winter to spring, definitely something I hope we see here soon. "Each Shining Hour" is a novel of Watervalley, Tenn., and details small town life with its big dreams and life among the familiars. Daniel Handler, also known as Lemony Snicket has a new book out that makes me feel warm because pirates don't like the cold, at least one never thinks of them raiding ships in the north seas, they are always where it is warm. "We Are Pirates" is a story of fathers and daughters, another thing that makes me warm.

Rosanna Ley has written 'the perfect summer read' at least according to Kate Furnivall in "The Villa." Tess has been bequeathed a house perched on a cliff in Sicily and must visit it as a condition of the bequest. Maybe the weather gets cold in Sicily, but I choose not to think about their cold weather. The lobby exhibit is changing. We have really enjoyed the paintings by members of the Northland Art Society the last two months. Students from Falls High School are displaying some of their work through April. See what they are creating.

PET OF THE WEEK

Hi, my new name is "Chevy." I guess they gave me that name because I was found under a car out in the cold. From the looks on the people's faces, I must have looked pretty rough. I was out on my own for what seemed like forever and my beautiful gray coat became very matted, so bad that I had to get a haircut - OK, the people had to shave me. I must admit, I am a bit cooler that what I am used to, but I am confident that my fur will grow back and I will be as handsome as ever. I enjoy snuggling with my new people friends. I relax and just listen to their hearts beat; it is very soothing. With all of that being said, I am very thankful to have a roof over my head, warm blankets, food, water and people to love me, but I'm not so fond of the cage. I know this is only temporary, so won't you please
