THE PENNSYLVANIA LOTTERY

Long before the Pennsylvania Lottery was formally created in 1971, lotteries were used as a way of raising money for a variety of works without needing governmental intervention. On this paper's front page, we can find a long advertisement for the "Grand State Lottery for Promoting Internal Navigation." The writers of Lancaster Journal herald money as the "sinew of war," yet they cannot resist being "attracted by the magnetism of interest." Prizes were drawn over a series of days, ranging from $500 to $40,000, or in today's dollars, $5,925 to $474.072.

"MIRACLE CURES"

The lower right section of the paper is dedicated to what appear to be multiple 'miracle cures" from a local doctor named T.W. Dvott. Right below "Dr. Robertson's Celebrated Stomachic Elixir of Health" is Dr. Dyott's own "Anti-Bilious Pills." What exactly is "bilious?" In the early 1800s, the diagnosis of bilious fever was often given to anyone who was shown to have both a fever and symptoms of nausea and vomiting. In probably the most famous case of the diagnosis, President Abraham Lincoln's son, Willie, was said to have died from a strong case of bilious fever. As this was a time of somewhat outrageous medicinal claims, Dr. Dvott's Anti-Bilious Pills are also promised to remove "yellow fever, chronic pain, flatulencies, indigestions, costiveness, hypochondriac complaints, strangury, rheumatism and gout."

1812 DRAGS INTO 1814

Extending briefly outside of its namesake, the War of 1812 would end by the close of 1814. The two-year conflict initially started thanks to the U.S. disagreeing with the trade policies of France and Great Britain, which had slowed U.S. expansion westward. Important skirmishes took place throughout 1814, including future president Andrew Jackson's victory in Pensacola, Florida, and a battle that ended with British soldiers briefly seizing the White House. Though the occupation only lasted a little over a day, British soldiers were able to burn down significant parts of the White House and the Capitol Building, among others. All told, the repairs cost $787,163. A peace treaty, the Treaty of Ghent, was signed on Dec. 24, 1814, formally ending the War of 1812.
