

Unity: the state of being one
Oneness

1 Peter 3:8 Finally, all of you

• be like minded ✓ check

• be sympathetic ✓ check

• love one another ✓ check

• be compassionate ✓ check

• and humbly ✓ check

In summary, I will be 80 in a few months, and I want to encourage everyone to respect and be thankful for our local hospital and its staff. I realize that there are many who would not agree with my based on their own ^{PERSONAL} experience, but believe me, bad things happen in large hospitals as well.

Also, express your thankfulness to those around you that impact and make a difference in your life.

Be a blessing to someone everyday, if only with a smile. It may be all they need.
Haron Littleman

Whatever I wanted, they saw to it that I got it. One time, I wanted a diet coke, well, you hate to bother a busy nurse for a diet coke. Well, there was a staff member walking by who looked into my room and smiled. I caught her attention and asked her if she would ask the nurse if she had anyone who could bring me a diet coke. Within minutes this kind lady came into my room with a diet coke and a large cup of ice. I found out she was an ultra sound technician.

She exemplifies the term "teamwork".

Every department deserves praise. The housekeeping was great, their staff were friendly and thorough.

The food was incredible. It was better than eating at home. I mean pot roast, meat loaf, fried chicken! Come on now! You can't get better than that. And, I was only there three days.

You know, small town hospitals get a bad rap, and maybe rightly so, but we can be proud of our small town hospital.

The doctors, nurses, all the professionals are a credit to their profession. They were confident, competent, and above all professionals.