GOP health care bill dead after two more senators voice opposition. > NATION, A7

Bowed over!

By Kevin Baird

Fairbanks’ own Great Alaskan Bowl Company was on display Monday at the White House, representing Alaska at the first made in America Product Showcase.

Great Alaskan Bowl Company owner Lewis Bratcher and his daughter, Emily Berriochoa, who previously worked for the company for four years and served on the Fairbanks City Council, represented the company at the event.

“We're just riding this high. There was an incredible array of talent and dedication,” Berriochoa said in a phone interview after the showcase. “There were family businesses and non-family businesses, and regardless of politics, everyone was proud to be on display. I ended up getting to shake the president and vice president's hands. It was an incredible opportunity.”

Berriochoa said they got the call representing Alaska in the made in America Product Showcase on Thursday.

“When you get a call from the White House you put everything on hold and you go,” Berriochoa said. “It really came out of nowhere.”

Bratcher and Berriochoa spent Monday in the East Room of the White House. Bratcher left Fairbanks with two “raggedy” suitcases full of bowls, and the company’s display was sandwiched between Gibson Guitars, of Timnies, and Stetson Hats, of Texas.

MUSIC FOR GENERATIONS

Dorothy Bunchard, 95, sits with her great-granddaughter, Coraline Luke, 1, as the pair listen to musicians, at left, performing chaucer music Monday afternoon at Raven Landing as part of the Fairbanks Summer Arts Festival Lunch Bites series.

By Kevin Baird

Fairbanks company goes on display at White House

By Kevin Baird

Fairbanks’ own Great Alaskan Bowl Company was on display Monday at the White House, representing Alaska at the first made in America Product Showcase.

Great Alaskan Bowl Company owner Lewis Bratcher and his daughter, Emily Berriochoa, who previously worked for the company for four years and served on the Fairbanks City Council, represented the company at the event.

“We're just riding this high. There was an incredible array of talent and dedication,” Berriochoa said in a phone interview after the showcase. “There were family businesses and non-family businesses, and regardless of politics, everyone was proud to be on display. I ended up getting to shake the president and vice president's hands. It was an incredible opportunity.”

Berriochoa said they got the call representing Alaska in the made in America Product Showcase on Thursday.

“When you get a call from the White House you put everything on hold and you go,” Berriochoa said. “It really came out of nowhere.”

Bratcher and Berriochoa spent Monday in the East Room of the White House. Bratcher left Fairbanks with two “raggedy” suitcases full of bowls, and the company’s display was sandwiched between Gibson Guitars, of Timnies, and Stetson Hats, of Texas.

MUSIC FOR GENERATIONS

Dorothy Bunchard, 95, sits with her great-granddaughter, Coraline Luke, 1, as the pair listen to musicians, at left, performing chaucer music Monday afternoon at Raven Landing as part of the Fairbanks Summer Arts Festival Lunch Bites series.

By Kevin Baird

Fairbanks company goes on display at White House

By Kevin Baird

Fairbanks’ own Great Alaskan Bowl Company was on display Monday at the White House, representing Alaska at the first made in America Product Showcase.

Great Alaskan Bowl Company owner Lewis Bratcher and his daughter, Emily Berriochoa, who previously worked for the company for four years and served on the Fairbanks City Council, represented the company at the event.

“We're just riding this high. There was an incredible array of talent and dedication,” Berriochoa said in a phone interview after the showcase. “There were family businesses and non-family businesses, and regardless of politics, everyone was proud to be on display. I ended up getting to shake the president and vice president's hands. It was an incredible opportunity.”

Berriochoa said they got the call representing Alaska in the made in America Product Showcase on Thursday.

“When you get a call from the White House you put everything on hold and you go,” Berriochoa said. “It really came out of nowhere.”

Bratcher and Berriochoa spent Monday in the East Room of the White House. Bratcher left Fairbanks with two “raggedy” suitcases full of bowls, and the company’s display was sandwiched between Gibson Guitars, of Timnies, and Stetson Hats, of Texas.

MUSIC FOR GENERATIONS

Dorothy Bunchard, 95, sits with her great-granddaughter, Coraline Luke, 1, as the pair listen to musicians, at left, performing chaucer music Monday afternoon at Raven Landing as part of the Fairbanks Summer Arts Festival Lunch Bites series.

By Kevin Baird

Fairbanks company goes on display at White House

By Kevin Baird

Fairbanks’ own Great Alaskan Bowl Company was on display Monday at the White House, representing Alaska at the first made in America Product Showcase.

Great Alaskan Bowl Company owner Lewis Bratcher and his daughter, Emily Berriochoa, who previously worked for the company for four years and served on the Fairbanks City Council, represented the company at the event.

“We're just riding this high. There was an incredible array of talent and dedication,” Berriochoa said in a phone interview after the showcase. “There were family businesses and non-family businesses, and regardless of politics, everyone was proud to be on display. I ended up getting to shake the president and vice president's hands. It was an incredible opportunity.”

Berriochoa said they got the call representing Alaska in the made in America Product Showcase on Thursday.

“When you get a call from the White House you put everything on hold and you go,” Berriochoa said. “It really came out of nowhere.”

Bratcher and Berriochoa spent Monday in the East Room of the White House. Bratcher left Fairbanks with two “raggedy” suitcases full of bowls, and the company’s display was sandwiched between Gibson Guitars, of Timnies, and Stetson Hats, of Texas.

MUSIC FOR GENERATIONS

Dorothy Bunchard, 95, sits with her great-granddaughter, Coraline Luke, 1, as the pair listen to musicians, at left, performing chaucer music Monday afternoon at Raven Landing as part of the Fairbanks Summer Arts Festival Lunch Bites series.

By Kevin Baird

Fairbanks company goes on display at White House

By Kevin Baird

Fairbanks’ own Great Alaskan Bowl Company was on display Monday at the White House, representing Alaska at the first made in America Product Showcase.

Great Alaskan Bowl Company owner Lewis Bratcher and his daughter, Emily Berriochoa, who previously worked for the company for four years and served on the Fairbanks City Council, represented the company at the event.

“We're just riding this high. There was an incredible array of talent and dedication,” Berriochoa said in a phone interview after the showcase. “There were family businesses and non-family businesses, and regardless of politics, everyone was proud to be on display. I ended up getting to shake the president and vice president's hands. It was an incredible opportunity.”

Berriochoa said they got the call representing Alaska in the made in America Product Showcase on Thursday.

“When you get a call from the White House you put everything on hold and you go,” Berriochoa said. “It really came out of nowhere.”

Bratcher and Berriochoa spent Monday in the East Room of the White House. Bratcher left Fairbanks with two “raggedy” suitcases full of bowls, and the company’s display was sandwiched between Gibson Guitars, of Timnies, and Stetson Hats, of Texas.

MUSIC FOR GENERATIONS

Dorothy Bunchard, 95, sits with her great-granddaughter, Coraline Luke, 1, as the pair listen to musicians, at left, performing chaucer music Monday afternoon at Raven Landing as part of the Fairbanks Summer Arts Festival Lunch Bites series.

By Kevin Baird

Fairbanks company goes on display at White House

By Kevin Baird

Fairbanks’ own Great Alaskan Bowl Company was on display Monday at the White House, representing Alaska at the first made in America Product Showcase.

Great Alaskan Bowl Company owner Lewis Bratcher and his daughter, Emily Berriochoa, who previously worked for the company for four years and served on the Fairbanks City Council, represented the company at the event.

“We're just riding this high. There was an incredible array of talent and dedication,” Berriochoa said in a phone interview after the showcase. “There were family businesses and non-family businesses, and regardless of politics, everyone was proud to be on display. I ended up getting to shake the president and vice president's hands. It was an incredible opportunity.”

Berriochoa said they got the call representing Alaska in the made in America Product Showcase on Thursday.

“When you get a call from the White House you put everything on hold and you go,” Berriochoa said. “It really came out of nowhere.”

Bratcher and Berriochoa spent Monday in the East Room of the White House. Bratcher left Fairbanks with two “raggedy” suitcases full of bowls, and the company’s display was sandwiched between Gibson Guitars, of Timnies, and Stetson Hats, of Texas.