One of the topics on the agenda of the next legislative session is adjusting the rules needed to get an initiative petition on the ballot. An initiative petition starts when an organization or group gets enough signatures to take a proposed constitutional amendment to voters. State Rep. J. Eggleston, R-Maysville, argues that the Missouri Constitution has become too large and too complex to be understood by the average voter. Eggleston said, "We need to make it easier for the people to understand what they're voting on, so they can make an informed decision."
