WATCHING FOR SIGNS OF WHAT’S TO COME

Fremont, cut off by floodwaters, may serve as a warning for towns downstream

By ERIN DUFFY, JULIE ANDERSON AND ERIN GRACE

Let Fremont be a warning. Floodwaters there cut off all roads in and out of town starting Friday. Two levees were breached Saturday. So residents know all too well about washed-out roads. They heard the flash flood warnings blaring from cellphones. They left their homes behind and ended up on cots in community centers or churches.

And all that could be an ominous sign of what’s to come in parts of southeastern Nebraska and western Iowa as record-busting water levels continue to push huge torrents of water downstream. Similar scenarios have played out from Columbus to Wood River to Plattsmouth. Levees breaching. Rivers, lakes and creeks swelling. And people in the way forced to make critical decisions: Should I stay

In Plattsmouth as the rivers rise: Sandbagging to save downtown

By RICK RUGGLES

PLATTSMOUTH — Blue sky and sweet sun beamed over Plattsmouth, a city whose rivers have become lakes. The cool, late-winter Saturday belied 48 hours of worry in town and flooding around it. By Saturday afternoon, city leaders found it necessary to erect a low sandbag wall in one spot where the now-extremely wide Missouri River threatened to enter Plattsmouth’s downtown. For the most part, Plattsmouth sits safely above the floodwater pooled along the Platte and the Missouri. But some surrounding areas endured flooding. Further, employees at the Cooper Nuclear Station power plant near Brownville stood on alert downstream. The Salvation Army’s Gene Eppley Camp washed out and appeared to be a total loss upstream toward Omaha.

Perfect storm of harsh winter, bomb cyclone brought flooding

By NANCY GAARDER
WORLD-HERALD STAFF WRITER

An eerie, thick fog settled over Nebraska and Iowa on Tuesday. Wisps of moisture drifted up from this winter’s record-setting snow piled along driveways and streets, blanketing cornfields and yards. The fog was bringing an early warning: a powerful cyclone was arriving. In popular culture it’s known as bombogenesis, or a bomb cyclone, an epic drop in air pressure that triggers historic weather. By itself, the moisture-filled storm would not have dealt Nebraska the crippling blow that has occurred. Our harsh, late winter
