

More deaths than births

South Carolina has gained nearly 1.5 million residents since 1990, but the number of annual births in the state is about the same now as it was then. The increasingly elderly populations are prompting local governments and nonprofits to reconsider the nature of services that residents most need.

