U.S. Air Force Staff Sgt. Corban Lundborg, with the 4th Combat Camera Squadron at Joint Base Charleston, South Carolina, participates in exercise while overseas in 2019, on a C-17 Globemaster III. Lundborg is a combat photojournalist and is seen with a街区的 photographers during an exercise in 2018.

"On a daily basis we are involved with creativity, adventure and challenges," Lundborg said. "I find peace and fulfillment in being a creative outlet. These two outlets led him to a career in art or writing, but he turned towards a new outlet of creative outlet. That was not the first time the Lowcountry experienced a large scale winter storm, on Mar. 10, 1973 the "Storm of the Century" hit South Carolina.

"The storm blanketed the state with snow and ice, with Charleston and Beaufort being the most affected by the ice," Lundborg said. "Highways became impassable and the area’s residents lost power and were forced to remain indoors in the dark.

"The area experienced a white Christmas in 1973 when a snowstorm hit the southeast from December 22-24, covering the region in snow. One of the highest snowfall levels recorded was in the North Carolina town of Wilmington which recorded 15 inches of snow."
