Purdue department heads face gender inequality in salary, selection

BY KATE LEWIS

Staff Reporter

Purdue's department head positions face differences in salary by gender and selection which dates back to the time many faculty received their doctoral degrees.

Purdue's salary report for 2013 revealed a more than $10,000 difference in average pay between male and female department heads. Men in this position earn an average of $194,602 annually, while women earn $181,161 on average. Furthermore, the highest paid female department head makes $243,641 while seven male department heads make more than $250,000.

But the inequality doesn't stop there. Within Purdue's 12 schools and colleges, only 11 department heads are women while 54 are men. Tom Brush, department head of management within the Krannert School of Management, is one of those 54.

Brush came to Purdue in 1992 and became department head in October of 2013. While he's still figuring out what it's like to be department head, let alone any differences that might exist between sexes in the role, Brush suggested that the inequality might lie in the gender distribution of professors at the University.

Department head is considered a senior position within the faculty of a university. While it is below the position of president, provost, or dean, department head is only available to tenured professors. Furthermore, Brush suggested that full professors are preferred over associate professors.

"Nobody really wants to have a department head who's not a full professor because they might get pushed around or annoy the people who will make the decision to promote them to a full professor, so it's a conflict that people try to avoid," said Brush.

In order to be either an associate professor or full professor, candidates must have a doctoral degree. According to reports from the National Center for Education Statistics, a part of the U.S. Department of Education, 2005 was the first year in which more women received doctoral degrees than men. Up until then, men received significantly more Ph.D.s than women, at least since the reports began in 1869. The group of professors that would currently be eligible for department head positions received their degrees before gender equality in doctoral programs.

Ellen Gruenbaum, department head of anthropology in the College of Liberal Arts, came to Purdue in 2008. Since then, she has seen firsthand how the College of Liberal Arts has worked to change the male-dominated culture of senior faculty positions.

"In just the five and a half years that I've been here, I've seen a big change," said Gruenbaum. "More women have begun to rise to higher ranks of the professoriate and be eligible for appointment to important academic positions."

When she arrived at Purdue, Gruenbaum was one of just two women on the Promotion and Tenure Committee within the College of Liberal Arts. Now, five of the 11 female department heads — almost half — are within the College of Liberal Arts.

"The nature of your discipline also determines the availability of women who have experience," said Gruenbaum. "If you're in a discipline that traditionally has had very few women, it's taken longer for women to get up into leadership roles."

This applies to the College of Agriculture and the College of Engineering, where all department heads are men. However, a balance of men and women in these positions brings new administrative styles and ways of thinking.

"Now, you'll notice I'm not a university president, I'm not a provost, I'm not a dean anymore, and you may say, 'Why is that?'" said Gruenbaum. "And some of the men department heads get paid a lot more than the women department heads ... but I don't think I'm doing this for the pay. I'm doing this because I really care about what my discipline can contribute."

While Gruenbaum's passion for anthropology outweighs her concern for the pay inequality, it may be years until the 2005 gender equality in doctoral degrees reaches senior positions within the University.

• The salary of Lt. Jerry Hubbard, department head of military science, is not a part of the above averages because, as military personnel, his salary is not available to the public.

PEER INSTITUTIONS

Discrepancies in faculty's salaries are dependent on external factors

BY HALEY CHECKLEY

Features Editor

Purdue prides itself on being a highly ranked university in the nation, but with this reputation comes pay inequalities.

The highest ranked faculty member earns $488,217 and the lowest earns $29,928.01. In some cases, monetary value is directly reflective of a faculty's contribution to their field and in other cases it is simply the field itself.

Provost Tim Sands explained the salary guide was calculated differently this year, which may account for some of the wage gap. Two years ago, the only number available would be the nine month salary actually paid by the University. Now, the number accounts for supplemental wages faculty earn during the summer months.

Glenn Sparks, a professor in the Brian Lamb School of Communication, is the third highest paid communication professor on campus with an annual salary of $143,013. Yet, one only needs to look at his resume to discern why this may be.

Quoted by publications such as Newsweek, Time, AP Press and NPR, Sparks is the author of various journal publications, a textbook entitled "Media Effects Research: A Basic Overview" and co-author of an upcoming edition of Em Griffin's text, "A First Look at Communication Theory."

"A faculty member's salary is only one part of their overall compensation package," Sparks said. "Other factors include retirement compensation, health benefits, additional teaching opportunities, start-up packages, internal grant opportunities, et cetera."

Sands said most of wage pay is driven by market forces. In order to stay in competition with other top universities, it is essential to compete for the top talent in the various academic fields.

"We compete globally for talent at Purdue ... So if a faculty member is a high performing faculty member, they have a global reputation in a field where salaries are typically high," Sands explained. "We want to go after that person to bring them to Purdue, (so) we will have to pay that market rate."

He also said the struggle to retain faculty doesn't stop with the initial pay offer. The effort to balance between staying in the annual budget as well as retaining as many employees as possible is a constant discussion.

"Most of our faculty are essentially on the market at any time, even if they don't really want to be. They are still going to be called," Sands said. "If they are successful, if they publish an important paper, or they serve on a committee in Washington ... they may become very visible in terms of their engagement with the public (and) our competing institutions will be after them."

Sands said ideally the University would pay faculty based on merit and not because of outside politics. The overarching need to provide students with a first-class education always superceeds this notion.

Sparks understands the need to compete directly with peer institutions and the overall quality of instructors is essential

"If we weren't competitive, that would affect the overall quality of the faculty over the long term," Sparks said. "I've been here 28 years and I've always regarded the Purdue faculty to be a high quality collection of educators."
