Dear Amy: Earlier this year, my partner of more than 20 years died of brain cancer. Every day is still very hard.
For almost all of those 20 years, we typically spent the holidays with his mother and father and his siblings and their children. (Both of my own parents are deceased, and my only brother lives in Europe.)
We typically spent the holidays with his family, and on New Year’s Eve, I became close with all of them, and the kids even called me “Uncle.”
Since then, the contact I have had with his family has been very minimal. I checked in with them a few times this year over email, sent birthday cards and gifts to the kids and even offered to host dinner. They declined all of my attempts to see them, so I figured they were still grieving, and did not push too hard.
I ran into my partner’s sister one day, and asked if they were planning to get together for the holidays this year. She was very uncomfortable, and said that they decided they were only going to do “close family” this year, and not do anything “too large.”
I asked her if I should plan to be there, and she said “probably not.”
I am very hurt. I considered these people family for a long time, and now feel like they want nothing to do with me, and that I never existed in the first place.
Several friends gave me the advice that they should tell me how I feel, and let me know how disrespectful they feel about their own son’s memory, but I also know they don’t want to hear that.
What do I do?
— Grieving

Dear Grieving: I agree with your friends in their counsel to be open about your feelings.
I disagree about chastising these family members, however. You are justified, to be sure, but I just don’t think it is useful to tell other people how to behave, while it can be useful (and helpful to you) to tell them how their behavior makes you feel.
Here is some suggested wording: “Since Dean’s death I have coped with my own sadness and extreme grief -- and I know you have, too. I have always considered you to be family members, and my connection to you has been a refuge during a very sad time. I’m so sorry to note that this connection seems to be fading, because I sincerely believe that we could help and comfort one another another.”

Dear Amy: I recently met a guy online. We’ve been going out for about five weeks. We’ve been on four dates. We’re not in a committed relationship, but he’s not being upfront about the fact that he’s seeing (and probably sleeping with) other women.
Because we are not exclusive, he and I have not slept together and I have told him that he won’t unless we are exclusive.
He has made up different excuses for his unavailability. I’ve contacted him about this but he seems to continue doing it. How should I handle this?
— Not Easy

Dear Not Easy: Actually, it sounds as if this guy has been fairly upfront about the fact that he’s seeing (and probably sleeping with) other women. You have obviously discerned this somehow, because you have basically your own relationship.
You just don’t seem to like his answer. Perhaps you should just go ahead and assume: Yes, he is available, he’s with other women. It is possible that he can figure out what you are thinking and start dating around. That’s sort of the whole idea, isn’t it? That’s how you find the right person until you find the right match.
If he really likes you, he would want to be with you, and you wouldn’t wonder where he was and he was. However, four dates really isn’t a lot of time to figure this out. You must be thinking he is not interested in you, unless you are a gay feeling pressured to become exclusive before he is ready. In that case, four dates is plenty.
