Tips for washing fresh produce

The U.S is in the middle, it would seem, of a scourge of food poisoning caused by a parasite called cyclospora (SY-klo-spor-ah) contaminating fresh produce. Lettuce from a worldwide produce company called Taylor Farms has been implicated, which has sources in many countries. The one suspect source here appears to be the lettuce from Taylor Farms in Mexico. So, all our lives we are told how good lettuce and leafy greens are for us. Many articles have recently been written about the problem, with advice on how to prepare fresh produce, especially lettuce.

One article dated July 16, 2026, from Good Housekeeping, called "How to Wash Produce During the Cyclospora Outbreak," begins, "If the recent cyclospora outbreak has you side-eyeing your salad, you're not alone." The parasite spreads through contaminated fresh produce and has sickened thousands of people of multiple states. At the last count from news reports it is in 16 states. The clinical picture is that it causes watery diarrhea, sometimes explosive (but nobody has blown to pieces over it), stomach cramps, nausea, fatigue, loss of appetite, and weight lost (not the best diet program?).

Unfortunately, cyclospora is notoriously difficult to wash off fresh produce. It clings stubbornly to leafy greens, herbs, berries, and other produce. It makes your usual rinse less effective for these microscopic microbial critters. The idea of selecting produce less liable to be contaminated could include choosing a whole lettuce head instead of a bag of chopped greens. Before washing it, remove and toss the outer leaves of the head if they look damaged, wilted, or visibly dirty. Then wash the remaining leaves one by one under cool running water paying special attention to the folds. Firm produce like cucumbers or melons can be scrubbed with a clean produce brush before cutting.

Forget using vinegar, bleach, and prepared produce washes. Despite the social media claims, no household washing solution can reliably remove this parasite from the produce so they aren't "the solution." Just running cool water works as well as anything. The article I used for reference cites Darin Detweiler, food safety expert and professor emeritus of Northeastern University College of Professional Studies. The FDA and CDC concur.

This and other articles say there is no need to wash greens that are marked pre-washed, even though it seems like a good idea. This article says it could introduce new contamination from the sink, colander, hands or countertop. Besides, one more rinse of the lettuce isn't going to remove any remaining cyclospora.

Peeling the produce when possible is also good after washing it. Also, cook it when possible.

Buying local at a farmer's market isn't always a guarantee to avoid contamination. It depends where the produce, especially lettuce, was harvested. If it came from large commercial fields like Taylor Farms in Mexico, with poor worker personal hygiene and sanitation, no telling what is on it, including cyclospora. The key is whether good agricultural and food safety practices were followed.

This is good advice, even after this "outbreak." Another reference was Hartford HealthCare, that University's newsletter. Others I found had much the same culinary preparation wisdom, each with an expert for consult. Another good summary was from the University of Minnesota Extension newsletter. And there are more.

These are all good pieces of food prep wisdom to help us avoid the current explosion of explosive diarrhea from the parasite. You have to think that this, too, shall pass (pun intended). It has made me wonder if perhaps for a while, dark chocolate pieces wrapped in foil might be a healthier and wiser choice than all those leafy green salads that are supposed to be good for us.
