

Better Together

By Nathan Learch, 5th grade

There are many jobs in the military including electronic maintenance, support services, front line officer, health care, and combat operations. Those are some of the most well-known jobs but there are many more less-known jobs that do not get a lot of praise. For example, a translator provides military personnel with translations of different languages and the awareness of diverse cultures. Another job that does not get a lot of attention is a radio operator. A radio operator monitors emergency frequencies to detect distress calls and dispatch emergency equipment. They also communicate with other operators to exchange transmission instructions. One final job that does not get a lot of praise is a meteorologist. They study and predict weather patterns. They also issue severe weather warnings. In conclusion, there are many jobs in the military, but many do not get the praise they deserve.
